The M.B.A. in Health Services Management program was developed by the Zarb School of Business in collaboration with the North Shore-Long Island Jewish Health System and Hofstra’s School of Education and Allied Human Services to meet the needs of professionals in the health care and related industries, including physicians, nurses, hospital administrators, insurance companies, health care providers, policy-makers and administrators, and others. Students in the program learn about the latest developments in the health care industry and their legal, ethical, economic, financial and health care policy implications. Besides building skills in the traditional areas of management, such as accounting, finance, information systems, quantitative methods, marketing and management, the program provides in-depth knowledge of the health care and management issues relevant to the field. The program provides a balance between theory and practice through structured course work, case studies, exercises, guest lectures and internships.
