Historical Note / Series Description

On September 11, 2001, terrorists attacked the United States by hijacking planes and crashing them into the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. A third plane was hijacked but the passengers revolted against the terrorists and the plane crashed in Pennsylvania before it could reach its target.

The World Trade Center is 30 miles west of Nassau County. Many Long Island residents worked in the World Trade Center's Twin Towers and the surrounding area known as the Financial District. New York City Firefighters and New York City Police Officers who rushed to the scene were from Long Island. Long Island residents who worked as fire fighters, police officers, MTA workers and construction workers went back to downtown Manhattan day after day to sift through the rubble. The personal accounts of some of these workers are a unique part of our collection.

Individuals, trade unions, government agencies and health care workers from Long Island rushed to the aid of the wounded city. This collection records their actions with documents, photos and personal accounts.

In the suburbs, workers took a break from the recovery efforts downtown only to wake up the next day and ride back to the city to continue cleaning up the aftermath. Businesses on Long Island donated money and supplies to the relief effort and to charities that helped the victims' families. The collection holds documentation of the efforts of these rescue and recovery workers and businesses.

However, it was not only the rescue and recovery workers who dedicated themselves to helping New York City; even elementary school students held fundraisers for the relief funds and sent cards and letters of encouragement to the workers in lower Manhattan—their stories can be found in this collection as well.

All over Long Island memorial services were held for those who were lost or died on September 11th. The lists of missing and lost are included in the collection, with the names of Long Island residents highlighted. Religious institutions worked overtime to plan funerals and to provide counseling and community outreach to all of the people who experienced different degrees of sadness, fear and confusion. The community service of religious institutions is documented herein as well.

Similarly, parents and teachers helped children to understand what had happened. Methods used by the adults and the words and images of the children of Long Island are included in this collection.

Even the entertainment industry was touched by these events, as is evident in the sports folders included in this collection and the newspaper comic pages in the days, weeks and months after September 11th.

The correspondence and published writings included in the September 11th Project collection reflect the thoughts of Long Island residents as they contemplated the terrorist attacks on the United States and the subsequent war on terrorism.

Nonprofit organizations like libraries, museums and historical societies attempted to collect and disseminate information. They were instrumental in putting events in context for people who sought and continue to seek a better understanding of how the nation and world changed as a result.

In local, regional and national publications, journalists tried to keep up with a world that had been changed in an instant and continued to change. Visual artists, poets and photographers tried to capture the many experiences and emotions that ran through the people of Long Island, New York, and the Nation.

The collection includes artifacts such as hardhats, gloves, respirators, boots, a pickax and a hoe used by Long Island residents who worked in the recovery effort on the 11th and in the days and weeks following the attacks. One of the banners that hung at the WTC site to encourage the rescue/recovery workers is emblazoned with the word "TEAMWORK" and a biblical quote.

The Hofstra community's reaction is embodied in the small objects including a candle and paper holder from Candlelight Vigil.

The Hofstra University Archives Long Island Studies Institute September 11th Project collection contains materials that show how the terrorist attack on the World Trade Center affected the people of Long Island. Development of the collection is ongoing and researchers have used the collection since its creation.

A part of the Hofstra University web page has provided an overview of the collection. Printouts document the web page in the folder "Hofstra—The September 11th Project." The web page is an indispensable tool for introducing the September 11th Project's attempts to collect and make available details of the human experience of history. This collection is a result of that process.

Scope & Content Note

The September 11 Project collection, which is composed of material created by Long Island residents, consists mainly of records of September 2001 and the following months.

Strong areas of the collection include email documents, photographs and artifacts produced by or related to the events of September 11 and the recovery effort. The collection includes correspondence (traditional letters and email), analog and digital photos, and artifacts.

Some items were originally produced for limited distribution such as the flyers, booklets, notices, computer files, audio and video materials. A video of oral history interviews is included as are photographs of September 11th memorials by photographer Robert L. Harrison.

Many items from the collection were used in exhibitions in September – November 2002 and in 2006. The exhibition catalogs are included with the collection.
